Although the best-known genres are epic and drama, most Greek poetry took the form of shorter works performed by soloists or choruses in any of a variety of meters. Since performance was usually accompanied by music, the term “songs” is often more appropriate than “poems”: ancient Greece of the Archaic period was a “song culture.”

This may be initially defined as poetry in elegiac couplets (see metre, greek (3), (4)). The term elegeion normally meaning 'elegiac couplet', is derived from elegos, a sung lament that must have been characteristically in this metre, but the metre was always used for many other purposes. A stricter definition distinguishes between elegiac poetry (elegy) and epigram (which was often in ...
