Justin Kurzel's Macbeth (2015), new on Blu, is less an attempt to adapt Shakespeare's play as it is an effort to translate the actual feel and atmosphere that Macbeth conjures among an audience. Kurzel's stunning eye for compositions establishes a hypnotic visual landscape and sense of otherworldly doom and despair.

Macbeth (2015) is one of the most visually striking and impressive, and altogether hauntingly epic movies of this decade. All hail Macbeth, that shalt be king hereafter! When people talk about "Shakespearean proportions", they should have Justin Kurzel's Macbeth as the primary example. Vicious, haunting, dreadful, and oh so beautiful.

MACBETH - Official Teaser Trailer - Starring Michael Fassbender And Marion Cotillard

Justin Kurzel's Macbeth is grandiose in production, with some stunning vistas and set design, but still never feels as epic or carry the emotional weight that comes from Shakespeare's play. As far as Macbeth adaptations go, this is on the least accessible end of the spectrum. The spoken dialogue remains as Shakespeare wrote it, but Kurzel and the cast have done an admirable job of conveying the scene's purpose visually (though I think they overdid it a bit with the intercutting).

That said, Kurzel has created a visually-striking hell that is all of Macbeth's own making. The criticisms made of Kurzel's Macbeth thus far seem to have to do with what parts of Shakespeare's source play are emphasized in this adaptation - sometime that partly reflects on Kurzel's direction, but perhaps more so the manner in which screenwriters Jacob Koskoff, Michael Lesslie, and Todd Louis approached the material.

Macbeth is visually stunning. Great landscapes, shots, everything. I didn't like certain slow motion scenes, particularly in the beginning of the film. The very beginning is actually the worst part of the movie.
