The mediator is a trained neutral party that facilitates the mediation process. Mediators are not judges. Their role is to help the individuals or groups involved in the conflict to isolate their issues, list possible solutions to each of those issues and then choose the mutually acceptable solutions to comprise a final agreement.

Mediation Information - Boulder, Colorado

Following a brief discussion of the importance of mediator neutrality, this article argues that question-asking is key to facilitating mediation. Four basic question types are described and some applications are offered. In addition to enhancing mediator neutrality, question-asking serves to empower the parties to reach their own resolution to the conflict.
